The transcriptions of English conversation printed in this book and simultaneously made available on magnetic computer tape (see p. 19) represent lengthy and arduous teamwork. This product, offered to all interested colleagues in all parts of the world, is the result of research, recording, analysis and compilation extending over many years and involving a great number of colleagues in the Survey of English Usage at University College London and in the Survey of Spoken English at the University of Lund. In particular, we would like to thank the following colleagues whose joint contributions have made this work possible. In London, during the period from 1960: Evelyn Abberton, Valerie Adams, Leta Almeda, Michael Anthony, Michael Black, Thelma Blackwood, Caroline Bott, Noel Burton-Roberts, Henry Carvell, Judith Carvell, Sylvia Chalker, Margot Charlton, R. A. Close, Jennifer Coates, David Crystal, Derek Davy, Anne Duckworth, Jo Evetts, Norman Fairclough, Jocelyn Goodman, Sidney Greenbaum, Kevin Halliwell, Joan Huddleston, Robert Ilson, Ruth Kempson, Hilary Kimpton, Geoffrey Leech, Rosemary Leonard, Audrey Morris, Susan Peppé, Judith Perryman, René Quinault, Jan Rusiecki, Oonagh Sayce, Grace Stewart, Catherine Sweetman, Janet Webb, Joy Webster, Janet Whitcut; in Lund, during the period from 1975: Mats Eeg-Olofsson, Oscar Forsheden, Penny Kenton-Russ, Lennart Månsby, Sven Norén, Bengt Oreström, Cecilia Thavenius.

Our research has been supported by numerous sources over the years, and we gratefully acknowledge in particular funds provided — in respect of the Survey of English Usage — by HM Government, the Longman Group, the Gulbenkian Foundation, the Leverhulme Trust, the British Academy, and — in respect of the Survey of Spoken English — the Bank of Sweden Tercentenary Foundation and the Knut and Alice Wallenberg Foundation.

1 Introduction

The Survey of English Usage was launched in 1959 at the University of Durham, moving to its present base at University College London the following year. Its goal was no less than to describe the grammatical repertoire of adult educated native speakers of British English: their linguistic activity ranges from writing love letters or scientific lectures to speaking upon a public rostrum or in the relaxed atmosphere of a private dinner party. Since native speakers include lawyers, journalists, gynaecologists, school teachers, engineers, and a host of other specialists, it follows

(a) that no individual can be expected to have an adequate command of the whole 'repertoire': who, for example, could equally well draft a legal statute and broadcast a commentary on a football game?

(b) that no grammarian can describe adequately the grammatical and stylistic properties of the whole repertoire from his own unsupplemented resources: 'introspection' as the sole guiding star is clearly ruled out.

We thus have unanswerable arguments for requiring a corpus of naturally produced material throughout the range of English usage and we need scarcely enter into the equally viable argument that can be advanced for objective data to offset idiolectal bias or the linguist's accidental omissions and distortions even in such areas of the repertoire (e. g. informal family discourse) in which he might quite rightly be regarded as thoroughly 'competent'.

But it might still be reasonably objected that for a language that has been continuously studied for hundreds of years (a tradition culminating in the great text-based grammars of such giants as Poutsma, Kruisinga and Jespersen) there can hardly be any need for a corpus-based study, starting de novo in the mid-twentieth century. To this it must be said that, with all honour and respect to our predecessors, text-based study is far from synonymous with corpus-based study. All (or at any rate most) of the statements in the earlier comprehensive grammars had textual support, but (a) no single text was subjected to complete description — the fundamental 'total accountability' principle of corpus study; (b) no attempt was made to draw even the eclectic examples from texts representative of the whole range of usage (there was a heavy bias in Jespersen, for example, for printed material, especially fiction); (c) it is not always easy to tell whether a textual sample from the 18th century is valid for 20th-century usage (or even whether the grammarian meant us to believe it so); and, most obviously, (d) it is only in the second half of the twentieth century that it became practicable to record spoken material and hence to subject to properly detailed study the most natural form of language and the one that is overwhelmingly dominant for any individual, in whatever walk of life.

It is clear from the foregoing that particular attention had to be paid to the selection of material to be collected if the corpus was to be representative of the 'repertoire' as a whole. The overall extent of a corpus (say, half a million words or three million words) must depend largely on non-linguistic factors — time, finance, manpower — though of course the smaller the corpus is, the less valuable it is bound to be in respect of coverage. On the other hand, it is fairly clear that an optimum scale of corpus can be established such that for common grammatical phenomena saturation has been reached, whereas for rare phenomena there can be no indication that further extension of the corpus would be significantly helpful.

Given a decision on the overall extent of the corpus, assignment of material within these limits is a purely linguistic matter. Which varieties to distinguish? How much textual material is desirable to determine the characteristics of a particular variety? Months of seminars took place to identify the parameters affecting linguistic variation within the individual (inter-personal relations, the subject matter being handled, etc.) and to set up varieties of English in which significant concentrations of grammatical phenomena occurred that were regarded as typical. The tendency to use the non-agential passive in scientific description ('A change of colour was observed at 300° C') is a valid if hackneyed example. While repeated sampling and argumentation established that linguistic conventions could be identified within a broad band of 'scientific description', only lexical items made the more specific distinction between engineering, physics, biology, etc., and thus no grammatical grounds existed for setting up such sub-categories in the corpus. On the other hand, having found evidence in style and grammar for setting up a category of newspaper English, the seminars further established comparable grounds for distinguishing the language of news reporting from other types of press material (sport and fashion reporting, for instance). We decided to include 'creative' writing in prose (though not in verse) because, although it is essentially mimetic of potentially all the other varieties (since a novel may involve fictive scientific discourse, legal argument, intimate conversation), it can easily be demonstrated that there are sufficient conventions in fiction as a whole to justify regarding imaginative prose as having specific variety characteristics in its own right.

It became clear that, as well as distinguishing between material originating 'on paper' and that in speech, written material was often sharply different in print as compared with the relatively uninstitutionalised forms adopted in personal composition, whether typed or handwritten. The seminars were able to establish, moreover, that while letters on social matters obviously differed from those on non-social matters (business, taxation, legal issues, etc.), the grammar in both categories varied sharply according to the personal relationship existing between writer and recipient. Three points in an essentially gradient relation were set up in consequence: participants regarded each other as on an intimate, an equal, or a distant footing. Similarly, the gradient between intimacy and distance was found to affect very strikingly the kind of language used in conversation. Another important factor was the presence of a microphone, which moved speakers in the direction of careful formal speech, whether or not the matter was being broadcast or merely recorded on a domestic machine. Again, usage on the telephone was demonstrated to be different from face-to-face speech, despite other factors (such as social relation and content) being held constant. It became clear therefore that the corpus must reflect all these contingencies.

Having fully argued out the 'varieties' that must be represented in the corpus, we instituted a further series of seminars to assign proportions of the corpus to the numerous varieties. We decided that there was no question of attempting to match proportions with the statistical distribution of the varieties according to normal use: this would obviously have obliged us to assign over 99 % of the corpus to the preponderant variety of conversation between people who were on an intimate footing. Instead, we saw the overwhelming criterion as being the relative amount of data (within the fixed quantum of the corpus as a whole) that would be required to represent the grammatical/stylistic potential of a given variety. On this basis, we were able so satisfy ourselves that although, for example, the English of statutes was strikingly different from other varieties, its linguistic features could be demonstrated from a relatively small selection of material, whereas the most intimate conversation — for all its repetitions and often vacuous content — comprised a rich range of grammar that required as lengthy sampling as possible. We were also motivated by the fact that for some varieties (especially again informal speech) description was relatively in its infancy and we could rely far less on supplementation of our observations from other and earlier grammatical descriptions.

The final design of the corpus, comprising 'texts' each of 5 000 running words, and each with its origin in the period since 1950, emerged as shown in Table 1.

It was never of course envisaged that any corpus, necessarily finite, would of itself be adequate for a comprehensive description of English grammar. From the outset (Quirk 1960), elicitation tests with native subjects were envisaged as an essential tool for enlarging upon corpus-derived information and for investigating features not perhaps found in corpus at all. The Survey strategy as a whole therefore may be summarised as in Table 2.

Nothing more will be said here on the elicitation component, but see Quirk and Svartvik 1966, Greenbaum 1969, Greenbaum and Quirk 1970.

All the corpus material is filed uniformly on 'slips' which provide a running overlap of two lines top and bottom so that every grammatical structure is adequately contextualised, as shown in the two slips reproduced in Sample I. The text illustrated in this sample is a private hand-written letter, and the filed version not only replicates exactly the spelling and punctuation of the original but uses strict conventions which represent alterations such as deletions or afterthought insertions.

Transcribing spoken material, with analogous fidelity to the original, naturally requires far more elaborate conventions. A prosodic transcription had to be evolved which, while allowing orthographic (non-phonetic) representation wherever possible, was sensitive to a wide range of prosodic and paralinguistic features in the spoken realisation as heard on the recording (cf Crystal and Quirk 1964, Crystal 1969). These are illustrated in Sample II.

In every case, after meticulously checking the typed version against the original, 300 copies of each slip are produced and 'first-stage analysis' then ensures total accountability by allowing every single instance of every grammatical phenomenon (from an indefinite article to a whole sequence of clauses) to have one slip devoted to it and filed accordingly. The corpus is thus stored at University College in filing cabinets each drawer of which is labelled in respect of a grammatical category (zero article, noun phrase, adjective sequences, comparative constructions, etc.) and contains all instances of that category found in the material, irrespective of the origin of the text.

Needless to say, access to this wealth of grammatical and stylistic material is keenly sought by scholars. Year by year, arrangements are made for grammarians from all over the world to come and pursue their studies in direct contact with the filed material and — where relevant — to the original tapes or other sources from which the filed transcriptions have been made. But of course the constraints of (for example) accommodation severely limit to a level far below world demand such direct access to the physical material. It was for this reason that the sister project was set up in Lund.

The Survey of Spoken English (SSE) at Lund University began in 1975 with the primary aim of making the spoken English material of the Survey of English Usage (SEU) at London available in machine-readable form. This will make it possible for interested scholars in any part of the world, first, to gain access to the spoken English material, in orthographic transcription with prosodic analysis, and, secondly, to use the computer tape for machine processing. However, realising that not all linguists who want to make use of our material have access to computers or, indeed, interest in using them, we make the material available also in printed form. Modern photosetting techniques enable us to achieve good printed representations from computer tapes, including upper and lower case letters and the symbols required for representing prosodic features. But lacking a set of internationally accepted conventions for such features, the translation of the material (stored on the computer tape in ASCII code) into a printed version is far from straightforward.

The first decision to be taken was whether the SEU version of prosodic analysis (see p. 15) was to be retained or changed in some way. We decided to reduce the amount of very detailed information by omitting some of the original prosodic and, in particular, paralinguistic features. Thus, the basic prosodic distinctions (tone units, nuclei, boosters, onsets and stresses) have been retained in the SSE version. Other features, including tempo (allegro, clipped, drawled, etc.), loudness (piano, forte, etc.), modifications in voice quality (pitch range, rhythmicality and tension), voice qualifiers (whisper, creak, etc.) and voice qualifications (laugh, sob, etc.) have been omitted.

The reasons for reducing the number of features are partly practical and technical, partly linguistic. While we do not want to minimise the importance of paralinguistic features, it is clear that they are less central than the basic distinctions (such as tone units, types of tone, place of nucleus) for most prosodic and grammatical studies of spoken English. However, for those who require the full set of features, the original material on paper slips will of course continue to be available for reference at the Universities of London and Lund. The following two illustrations correspond to material on the SEU slip reproduced as Sample II. They are respectively a paper output of the computer tape (Sample III) using a format of one tone unit per line, and a printed version of the same text sample (Sample IV). The latter version is adopted in the present volume and has great advantages in easy readability: notice for example that words carrying nuclear tones appear in small capital letters with arrows above the nuclear syllable indicating type of tone. It is virtually identical with the system in Quirk et al (1972) where the distinctions are explained in Appendix II and the references there provided.[1]

The input of the texts at Lund took place on a video display terminal (Delta 5500, with 96 characters, upper and lower case). The texts were encoded via cassettes (Datum 4002 Universal Recorder) by on-line connection into ASCII characters in a file on disc at the 1108 UNIVAC computer belonging to Lund University. A series of check programs was run for spotting logical errors in the input material, such as omitted matching brackets. The paper output was proof-read and corrected several times by the research team until the texts were free from errors. In addition, the original audio tapes were checked in London in order to clear up doubtful issues in the prosodic analysis.

The distribution of the magnetic tapes of the spoken English corpus is handled by the International Computer Archive of Modern English (ICAME).[2] The primary purposes of this organization are the following:

(a) collecting and distributing information on (i) English language material available for computer processing; and (ii) linguistic research completed or in progress on this material;

(b) compiling an archive of corpora to be located at the University of Bergen, from where copies of the material can be obtained at cost.

In addition to the London-Lund Corpus, ICAME includes the Brown University Corpus of American English and the Lancaster-Oslo/Bergen Corpus, a complementary body of British English texts. Copies of the magnetic computer tape can be ordered from the Norwegian Computing Centre for the Humanities, Box 53, University of Bergen, N-5014 Bergen, Norway.

The chief aim during the initial phase of the SSE was to make available the collection of prosodically transcribed recordings of the SEU in London to all scholars interested in spoken English. Since the material will be ready for computer processing, we also hope that it will provide an impetus to computational text analysis and a common platform for international cooperation in this field. Some studies based on this material have already been started at Lund.

Our plans for the second phase of the SSE include a system of grammatical tagging, i.e. grammatical analysis entered in the actual text. It is of course possible to make computational studies of the present corpus without prior grammatical analysis. Since prosody is already marked on the computer tape, such phenomena as length of tone units, place in the tone unit of the word carrying the nuclear syllable, and type of nuclear tone, can be studied by computer. Lexical items as well as grammatical items which can be stated in 'concrete' lexical terms, such as specific adverbs or auxiliaries, can also be searched by computer. However, the possibilities of obtaining information about the grammatical properties of spoken English, and in particular about the interrelationship of grammar and prosody, are limited without adding tagging to the present text.

Given that no fully automatic system for grammatical tagging exists and that a completely manual method of tagging would be extremely time-consuming for a corpus of this size, we propose to implement a semiautomatic, interactive system. This is based on the linguist working at a terminal and having direct on-line access to the computer where certain programs will provide him with information that he needs. Such programs would help in assigning word-classes to words, and assigning syntactic functions to word-class constituents.

It follows from this that interactive analysis along these lines would differ from the ordinary batch-run type of computer use. Instead a cumulative, heuristic inquiry would be instituted where the programming would form an integral part of the linguistic analysis.

2 List of symbols

The following section lists the symbols used in the transcription. The material now exists in three different versions: on paper slips in the Survey of English Usage, University College London and the Survey of Spoken English, University of Lund (SLIP); on magnetic computer tape (TAPE); and in the printed form of this book (BOOK). Since some users of this corpus may want to use or refer to more than one version, the symbols used in the three versions have been listed below, side by side. It is not possible to explain the symbols here and for explanations of the prosodic system we refer to Quirk et al 1972 (Appendix II), Crystal 1969 and Crystal and Davy 1975. The user of the computer tape will find a description of the magnetic computer tape version on pp. 32—33.

NOTES

1 Text number on the magnetic computer tape can be found in columns 1—5 (see further p 32).

2 Speaker identity on the magnetic computer tape is given in columns 18—23. Note that '?' (063), '/' (047), and '(' (040) have different functions in columns 18—23 and columns 28—78 (see further p. 32).

3 A and B speak, laugh, etc. simultaneously.

4 Either A or B speaks, laughs, etc; speaker identity cannot be firmly established.

5 For the term 'non-surreptitious speaker', see p. 26.

6 Simultaneous talk is indicated by pairs of asterisks or plus signs, and it occurs in various combinations:

B ☆...

A ☆...

A ☆...
B☆... ☆
C...☆

A ☆...
C...

} Everything from the first to the last asterisk occurs simultaneously, i.e. also C's talk.

A..☆...☆..
B ☆...+ ☆....+

7 'Contextual comment' indicates non-linguistic activity, such as (laughs), (coughs), (enters), (telephone rings) or technical mishaps, e.g. (gap in recording), (10 seconds untranscribable). Note that '·' and '-' here mean length of contextual comment, e.g. (· laughs, (- coughs), (– – giggles), etc.

8 'Incomprehensible words' denotes one or more words where it is uncertain what is said in the tape-recording. In some cases it is only possible to tell the number of syllables, e. g. «10 to 12 sylls».

9 The 'tone unit' (TU) is the basic prosodic unit in our analysis. The 'onset' is the first prominent syllable in a tone unit. It is possible for a speaker to complete another speaker's TU. e. g.

B ‖ and they 'sort of 'REINFORCE one {an‖other's [ə:] . «sort of»
D △EGOS ■}■ (S.1.12 TU 989-990)

10 Subordinate TUs can occur in complex combinations, e. g.

well ‖why "should ▷ they ▷ not ▷ use {the ‖words of the ORIGINAL {if they're ‖making a SUMMARY ■} ■} ■ (S.1.1 TU 964)

11 The peak of greatest prominence in a tone unit is called 'nucleus'. The nucleus symbol has been placed as follows. In words with a single vowel: YES, YES, YES; in digraphs: READ; in words with a mute vowel: GUESS; in words with a semivowel: BEAUTIFUL, EUROPE but QUITE, CHOIR. A consonant can also take nucleus, e. g. OK, [m]. Throughout this book the word carrying the nuclear tone is printed in small capital letters except for 'words' appearing within square brackets. On the magnetic tape the nucleus symbol is placed before vowel/consonant.

12 In addition to the combinations of nucleus types listed here, there are other combinations, such as fall-rise plus fall, fall plus rise plus fall, fall plus level etc. (see Crystal 1969). The latter part of trinuclear tones determines with what binuclear tones they are classified.

13 Whereas direction of pitch is described in terms of nucleus, range of pitch is described by the booster system, which indicates relative pitch level. For stressed syllables the normal situation is a slight drop. Departures from this have been marked with the given symbols placed before the syllable boundary.

14 Colon (058 in decimal code) has two functions on the magnetic tape. Outside square brackets it always denotes booster; inside square brackets it denotes vowel length in all cases except when it is immediately preceded by an opening square bracket '[' or space, in which case it denotes booster,e. g.

:yes = booster [:ði] = booster
[ði:] = vowel length [ði :ði] = booster

15 Stress symbols are placed before syllable boundary.

16 Pause symbols are always surrounded by space except in combination with asterisks '☆' and plus signs '+', both denoting simultaneous speaker activity (cf p. 21).

17 Hyphen as punctuation mark is never preceded or followed by space except when pause is included in a hyphenated word. Compare note 7 and the following:

full-time = hyphenated word (full-time)
full - time = full + pause + time
full- · time = full + hyphen + pause + time

A fourth use of the hyphen on the magnetic computer tape is as a connecting symbol for words which are normally written solid but are split up in the text by a pause, e. g.

remem . ber

On the magnetic computer tape such word partials surrounding a pause are indicated by a hyphen placed immediately in front of each of the two word partials, e. g.

-remem . -ber

In this case the hyphen is thus used as a technical device, not as a true graphic symbol.

18 All phonetic symbols are given in square brackets (in decimal tape code '[' = 091, ']' = 093).

3 Information about the speakers

The specimens of conversation printed in section 5 are intended to represent spontaneous conversation among educated British speakers. The speakers are Brittish (with one exception in S.2.5) and educated to university level. The recordings were made without the prior knowledge of the main participants, and to prevent the possibility of identification, the names used in the transcriptions are fictitious but prosodically equivalent to the originals. In cases where one or more participants had knowledge of the recording (and had the task of keeping the conversation going), such non-surreptitious speakers have beeen specially designated by lower case letters (eg. a, b). Their contributions to the conversation have not been included in the total 5 000 words of each text, nor have their utterances, as a rule, been prosodically analysed.[1] For the symbols used to describe speaker identities, see p. 21. In view of the fact that the recordings were made surreptitiously, the audio tapes cannot be made available.

80	A2	Blank

[1] Records make up complete or incomplete TUs. A complete TU is terminated by '#' (number sign). Following '#' there may also be pauses, comments, or semi-colons. Semi-colon (decimal code 059) is used to denote a blank. Speakers often interrupt each other and, consequently, TUs may be split up into so-called links. TU links may be interwoven. For a TU to be considered properly linked, all links except possibly the last one must be incomplete, i.e. it lacks '#', and the speaker should be indicated by '(' in col 18 in all links except possibly the first one. Study TUs 16—17 in text 1—1 of the sample record file. Every TU consists of at least one link. If there are more, links are numbered in decreasing order (cols 14—15). A link normally goes into one record ('line') but may extend over several. Within each link, therefore, lines must be numbered, which has been done decreasingly on sequential input.

a [28] [əm] what we have been desperately short of is [əm] the most intimate kind of writing and speaking

A [29] ‖[m̀hm]■

a [30] now [əm] you know [ə] the way one speaks as no doubt Hilary has been telling you [əm] when your hair is let down ·

A 31 ☆‖YÉS■☆

a 32 ☆the☆ kind of things that the one can allow oneself to say I don't mean merely the subject matter because the subject matter is of no particular concern ☆to us☆

A 33 ☆‖[m̀]■☆

a 34 [əm] but as you well know the way in which you will write a letter to your son or your wife or your mother or something ☆☆is very☆☆ different from the way you write to almost anyone else [ə] because the threshold of criticism becomes very different and the possibilities of criticism your reaction to criticism becomes so ☆very different☆

a 37 well if you if you admit that if you admit that the private letter the private conversation with with one's wife will be very different [əm ə] will be much less selective about structures and so on that one uses then you will admit the further points that the talking to oneself that one does on paper in one's private diary ☆-☆ is probably the most genuine expression of oneself that [ə] is ever permitted one one talks to oneself [ə] either +subvocally

A 38 ☆‖[m̀]■☆ 39 +(laughs - -)+

>a 37 or in the case of+ of [ə] some unfortunates actually vocally [əm ə] but the obviously this is not a possible subject of study since the people ☆☆who talk to themselves aloud☆☆ are crazy

A 41 ☆«but» ‖I've always «been 'told» that △DÌARISTS☆ are 'crazy■ 42 as ‖WÈLL■ 43 ☆☆(laughs - -)☆☆

a 44 [əm] ☆☆well there may be of course something in this but there's☆☆ an awful lot of them in that [in] in that case cos diarists you see are of two kinds apparently the the the the sort of Harold Macmillan the the [əm] Harold Nicholson type who write their diary because they are aware of having their pulse on the on the goings on of the time ·
