Racist, Reclusive, Emotionally Suppressed

Borya “Buryat” Borovnikov (Боря Боровников), also known by the nickname “Buryat”, is a resident of Pripyat Purgatory and a former paramilitary gang leader from St. Petersburg, Russia. He is the elder brother of Katya.

BACKGROUND

Borya was born in 1982 in Leningrad, Soviet Union (now St. Petersburg, Russia), into a turbulent post-Soviet environment marked by economic collapse and rising street violence. Raised in a decaying suburb with limited prospects, Borya developed a rigid worldview early in life — one shaped by hypermasculine expectations, paranoia, and a belief in social decay.

BORYA “BURYAT” BOROVNIKOV

GENERAL

As a teenager, Borya was known for his towering build and stoic demeanor. Unlike his younger sister Katya, who leaned toward flamboyant expressions of radicalism, Borya operated quietly — a strategist rather than a provocateur. The two were inseparable in their youth, forming the ideological and operational backbone of the gang Sparrow Crew, which later evolved into Blood Battalion.

After a brief conscription into the Russian Armed Forces, Borya was discharged following a violent altercation with another recruit. He claimed the dismissal stemmed from a "personality incompatibility" with the army — though unofficial reports cite a psychiatric evaluation after a beating incident. He later attended a vocational college for architecture, graduating with mediocre grades, and was expelled from Russian State Social University shortly after.

In 2005, He co-founded the Blood Battalion — a more disciplined, secretive offshoot of her former gang. While Katya served as the public face of the movement, Borya operated in the shadows — overseeing recruitment, propaganda production, and organizational discipline. .

DEATH

Borya died in 2008 at age 24 alongside his sister. Their bodies were discovered in a rundown Moscow apartment with clear evidence of execution-style killings. The case was quickly labeled a drug-related incident by authorities, though survivors from the Blood Battalion later claimed it was part of a larger internal purge.

The killings were reportedly carried out by rival factions during a leadership split between Moscow- and St. Petersburg-based neo-Nazi cells. Borya's murder was both retaliatory and strategic — eliminating a liability in a movement already collapsing from within.

AFTERLIFE

Borya was initially processed for Hell, but his psychological evaluations — noting signs of profound emotional detachment and blunted affect — qualified him for re-assignment under the High-Conflict Rehabilitation Wing of Pripyat Purgatory.

Now residing in the crumbling outskirts of Pripyat with his sister, Borya lives a mostly quiet afterlife. Unlike Katya, who remains vocally antagonistic, Borya has grown introspective. He no longer partakes in political rants or ideological debates, instead spending hours alone reading, smoking, or maintaining a small rooftop garden.

He occasionally attends rehabilitation sessions but rarely speaks unless directly addressed. Staff describe him as “observant, unnerving, but compliant.” He holds no official job in Purgatory but sometimes volunteers to assist with mechanical repairs or structural maintenance in the apartment blocks.

Despite his ideological past, Borya avoids confrontation and seems to harbor guilt over his life choices — particularly the death of his sister, whom he feels he failed to protect. This remorse, however, remains unspoken.

Trivia

- His nickname “Buryat” short for “Slayer of Buryats”, Ironically, the shortened form makes it sound like he's Buryat himself
- Many of Borya’s Nazi tattoo are real symbols from Russian's neo-nazi organizations, including: NS/WP Crew, Russian National Unity and Battle Organization of Russian Nationalists (BORN).
- The skull on his mask is from a Tottenkompf.
- Despite being a loner and antisocial, he yerns for a female companion.
- He acts like Katya's "Tard wrangler".
- His design is partially based of Maxim "Tesak" Martsinkevich.
- He is constantly working out.
