Empathetic, Soft-Spoken, Gentle

Quiet, empathetic, and idealistic. Carrie believes people can change and prefers listening over lecturing. She struggles with guilt over her final actions in life, but channels it into her work.

BACKGROUND

Carrie Newkirk was born and raised in Vancouver — a city she always found too loud, too fast, and too far from the kind of life she wanted. After finishing school, she moved east, eventually settling near Lake Temagami in northern Ontario, drawn by the quiet forests and the promise of purpose.

CARRIE NEWKIRK

There, she found work as a counselor at a therapeutic summer camp for children with Down syndrome. It wasn't glamorous, but it was good. Carrie had a natural gentleness and a patient presence that made her a favorite among both campers and staff. Her acoustic sing-alongs, nature walks, and soft voice became part of the camp's atmosphere.

Carrie's adult life revolved around caregiving. She spent every summer at the camp and lived modestly the rest of the year. Privately, though, she felt creatively unfulfilled. In her final year, she quietly took several thousand dollars from the camp's funds — money she intended to use for an artist's retreat. She planned to return it before anyone noticed. She never got the chance.

DEATH

Carrie's death wasn't dramatic. The morning she died was damp and gray. It had rained overnight, so the dock was slick. After a lighthearted group activity, her sun visor got caught in the breeze and tumbled into the lake. Out of habit, Carrie leaned over the edge to retrieve it. Just a little more reach...

Her shoes slipped. She went in fast and headfirst, Carrie didn't know how to swim. She always meant to learn, but never did. There was no scream. No splash loud enough to draw attention. The campers were distracted — some already heading toward the dining hall. It only took a minute or two. Cold shock, panic, silence...No one realized she was missing until lunch.

They searched the shore, the cabins, even called the police. Her body was never recovered. The official story stayed simple: missing.

Her family is still looking for her

AFTERLIFE

Over time, Carrie began organizing informal support groups for borderline souls — violent, unstable, ideologically twisted people who hadn't yet tipped into Hell. Her methods were clumsy at first — songs, camp games, journaling prompts — but something in her tone disarmed people. Even monsters.

Six months in, she submitted a proposal. It wasn't even approved officially, but no one stopped her. The initiative gained a name: H.O.P.E. – Human Oversight for Purgatory Evaluation.

Today, Carrie serves as its lead Rehabilitation Case Worker. Most of her peers are sterile, apathetic who treat the job like an obligation. Carrie's human touch stands out. She runs group therapy, one-on-one counseling, and outreach efforts across the most unstable corners of Pripyat. In her class are war criminals, cult leaders, and the violent psychopaths. Some of them mock her efforts nicknaming the department “False Hope.” Others say she’s the only reason they haven’t lost what little is left of themselves.

Six weeks after her arrival, Carrie’s file was cleared for Heaven, she declined “They’ve got plenty of angels up there. These folks don’t.” And she stayed.

- Hair: Copper Auburn
- Eyes: Pale green
- Build: Chubby

Carrie wears a taupe-brown crewneck sweater, fitted but comfortable, with the sleeves pushed or rolled up slightly around the forearms. Underneath, she has a white collared shirt poking out at the neckline, giving the look a casual-professional touch — somewhere between counselor, office worker, and community volunteer. She’s wearing dark blue skinny jeans — snug and practical, with some light stretching and wrinkling around the knees. Black low-top Converse-style sneakers with white soles and toe caps. Scuffed and simple, they say “approachable,” not corporate. On her chest is a bright yellow circular pin reading "H.O.P.E", styled like a cheery smiley face badge and an Orange lanyard with a clipped-on blue ID badge.
