She is a resident in Pripyat Purgatory.

PERSONALITY

- Athletic
- Optimist
- Energetic
- Vegan
- Cry baby
- Vain

Sporty weightlifter

Uzi has a self-assured presence in the Purgatory. Outwardly, she is confident, driven, and endlessly energetic. Beneath the glamour and selfies, however, lies a woman both shaped and scarred by repression, violence, and a lifelong hunger to be seen

BACKGROUND

Uzza Safiya Al-Mahdi or "Uzi" was a Sudanese fitness icon, amateur bodybuilder, and online personality whose secret double life ended in tragedy. Born in Kassala, Eastern Sudan, into a rigid Salafi Muslim household, her early years were shaped by religious conservatism, social repression, and strict control over her body, voice, and image. From a young age, however, Uzi developed a fascination with strength and visibility — two things denied to her in real life. While living under heavy restrictions, she secretly trained in private and built a powerful physique, documenting her transformation online through a hidden identity: @UziOnFullAuto.

She wore full niqab in her videos, but she knew what she was doing. Her outfits were tight enough to show off muscle, her captions flirted with controversy, and she always hit the right angles. Her content was a balancing act between empowerment and provocation — and she walked that line proudly. Her following grew fast. Thousands, then tens of thousands. People from all over the Muslim world commented on her confidence, her strength, her "aesthetic jihad." Others called her haram filth. She didn't care. She was being seen.

But the more famous she got, the sloppier she became. She used the wrong account on a family phone. Her younger cousin saw a saved post, showed his brother, and the secret unraveled in hours. Her father didn't speak to her that evening. Her older brother paced the hallway, asking no questions. Uzi slept in her room with headphones on, listening to distorted trap remixes and planning a new post.

DEATH

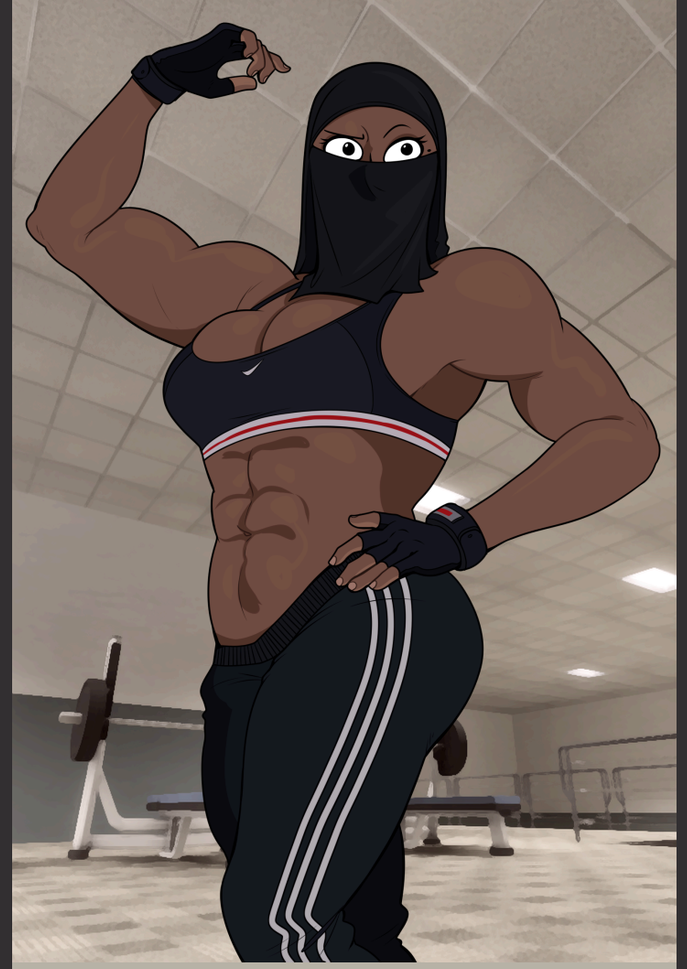

CUzi was killed in her sleep in 2018. Her brother shot her once in the temple with a hidden handgun their father had kept from the war in the south. The sound was muffled, the family complicit. No funeral was held. The body was buried before sunrise. The official story was "missing." Her accounts were deleted. Her name was scrubbed.

AFTERLIFE

Uzi arrived in Pripyat Purgatory under the classification of "Victim of Circumstance," a bureaucratic label reserved for those killed unjustly by others but still morally unfit for Heaven due to ego, narcissism, or self-interest. She was not punished — but she was not cleared either.

Now, she lives in a small apartment near the Pripyat Sport Complex, where she spends her days working out, recording fitness routines, and live-streaming to no one. Though the internet exists in Purgatory, Uzi's accounts are long gone — deleted with her death. Still, she records daily content as if she had followers, smiling into empty cameras, editing videos, posting selfies, and scripting captions.

Her apartment is decorated with gym posters, scented candles, and mirrors — so many mirrors. She eats a strict vegan diet (though complains about Purgatory's lack of variety), avoids socializing unless complimented, and insists that her "next arc" will be spiritual growth — though she says this every week.
