PERSONALITY

- Social Worker
- Work-A-Holic
- Nervous
- PTSD
- Introvert
- Loner

Anatoly Chebanov is a Pridnestrovian office worker and resident of Pripyatory. He dies of a stress-induced aneurysm at the age of 56 while working at his desk. Known in life as a meek and unassertive man, Anatoly lives with a constant sense of fear, inadequacy, and unfulfillment, leaving behind no children or lasting legacy.

In Pripyatory, he is seen as a relic of the Soviet era: soft-spoken, nervous, and solitary. He volunteers as a file manager for the Bureau of Soul Administration (BSA), keeping himself occupied through office work, but remains socially withdrawn and isolated.

Anatoly is quiet, introverted, and conflict-averse. He is often described as timid and milquetoast, prone to stammering speech and a nervous demeanor. He avoids confrontation whenever possible and carries himself with an air of constant worry, as if perpetually expecting reprimand.

ANTON

He harbors deep feelings of inadequacy and resentment toward his own life, considering himself overlooked, emasculated, and unfulfilled. Despite this, he maintains a strict personal discipline, finding solace in repetitive tasks and old-fashioned work habits such as handwriting, filing, and using his personal typewriter.

BACKGROUND

Anatoly is born in 1931 in the Moldavian Soviet Socialist Republic (later the region of Pridnestrovie). In his early adulthood, he serves in the military and is tasked with disciplinary duties over new recruits. His harsh enforcement of regulations contributes to several cases of psychological breakdowns and suicides among young soldiers. This period leaves him deeply traumatized, burdened with guilt, and feeling morally compromised.

After leaving the military, Anatoly works as a mid-level office employee in a Soviet administrative department, holding a clerical position related to records and disciplinary management. His professional life is defined by bureaucracy, stress, and long hours of repetitive tasks.

His inability to adequately provide for his wife and meet the social expectations of manhood in the Soviet Union contributes to the collapse of his marriage. He is divorced in his late forties and spends the remainder of his life living alone in modest conditions.

DEATH

In 1987, while working in his office, Anatoly suffers a fatal aneurysm attributed to years of accumulated stress. He dies at his desk, surrounded by paperwork. His death goes largely unnoticed outside of his immediate workplace.

AFTERLIFE

In Pripyatory, Anatoly continues his familiar patterns of clerical work. He volunteers as a file manager for the Bureau of Social Administration, preferring the monotony of paperwork to the anxieties of social interaction. He avoids modern tools such as computers, instead relying on pen, paper, and his personal typewriter, which he treats with meticulous care.

Outside of work, Anatoly lives a solitary routine. He occupies a small studio apartment and is often seen sitting on park benches, quietly observing others, or pacing in circles until nightfall. Residents describe him as unassuming and non-threatening, a man who blends into the background. While not disliked, he is rarely noticed, existing on the margins of Pripyatory's community life.
