Profile

Azerbajian Man

Francis is an American resident for Pripyatory

He is a resident in Pripyat Purgatory. Known by his absurdly self-chosen pseudonym “Francis Touchdown” is an academic prodigy who veered into violent extremism. After years of studying the effects of industrial pollution and overfishing on marine ecosystems, Francis’s frustration with modernity grew into a rigid and dangerous ideology. Rejecting both leftist and far-right politics, he became an advocate for cultural primitivism, condemning all forms of advanced technology as the root of humanity’s moral and environmental decay. His disillusionment pushed him toward a self-imposed exile, abandoning the lecture hall for a cabin on the fringes of Massachusetts, where he began a lone-wolf campaign of eco-terrorism.

PERSONALITY

- Obnoxious
- Friendly
- Comedic Relief
- Sociopath
- Extremist
- Optimist

Francis Touchdown appears disarmingly jovial one moment and terrifyingly unhinged the next. With a ridiculous, almost cartoonish foregein accent layered over his thick Azerbaijani pronunciation, he delights in playing the role of a clueless, self-deprecating immigrant enamored with “good old Americana”, apple pie, baseball, classic cars—while slipping archaic religious phrases into his speech in bizarre, satirical ways. He once referred to the American Civil War as “the time the infidels in the Southern States seceded from the Khilafat, prompting President Ibrahim Lincoln to declare fatwa against them, and thus began the American Civil Jihad.”

FRANCIS

He is highly impressionable when it comes to cultural quirks, often adopting mannerisms or idioms after hearing them once, but utterly immovable in his political and moral convictions. His views are steeped in racism, misogyny, and xenophobia, forming a worldview where only a violent “return to nature” can save humanity. Despite these beliefs, he presents himself to most people with warmth and humor, smiling easily, telling tall tales, and helping with small tasks, until something triggers his darker side. In those moments, his face hardens, his act drops, and his words become laced with cold menace.
Francis thrives in solitude, preferring the quiet rhythm of his off-grid life to the chatter of others, but he is not antisocial; he simply guards his inner world carefully. Around others, he maintains the air of a man who knows more than he lets on, his eccentricities a smokescreen for a calculating and deeply dangerous mind.

BACKGROUND

Born in Baku during the waning years of the Soviet Union, Bayram displayed extraordinary intellectual ability from a young age, particularly in the natural sciences. His fascination with marine biology took him abroad, eventually earning him a professorship at Boston University. For years, he published groundbreaking research on environmental degradation and oceanic ecosystems, winning international acclaim. But the more he saw of industrial and technological expansion, the more embittered he became toward modern civilization.

By his late thirties, Bayram’s lectures had shifted from scientific discourse to scathing diatribes against human progress. He became a vocal advocate of dismantling modern society altogether, promoting a romanticized vision of humanity living in small, self-sufficient communities untouched by machines.

Bayram came to believe that modern technology, consumer culture, and industrialization were existential threats to both humanity and the natural world. His writings and lectures began incorporating militant rhetoric, advocating not just for environmental reform but for the total dismantling of technological society — by violent means if necessary. His extremism eventually led to his resignation (under pressure) from Boston University, after which he adopted a reclusive, self-sufficient lifestyle in rural Massachusetts.

DEATH

Francis’s final act in life was the 1999 Fenway Park bombing — a meticulously planned attack on a sold-out baseball game, which he viewed as a symbol of American complacency and consumerism. Using pressure cooker bombs, he detonated explosives during a high-tension moment in the game, killing three and injuring twenty-three. He was gunned down by police while attempting to flee the scene, refusing to surrender.

His alias Francis Touchdown originated here: when purchasing his ticket, he used a fake ID hastily cobbled together from a novelty sports fan membership card and a forged driver's license. In the rush, he named himself after the most American thing he could think of: "Francis" (from a random Catholic saint) and "Touchdown" (from American football). He later found the absurdity of the name amusing, keeping it even in death.

AFTERLIFE

In Pripyatory, Francis lives in the outskirts, avoiding the central residential areas. He has built a primitive hut from scavenged materials and grows his own food, maintaining his belief in self-sufficiency even in the afterlife. Despite his isolation, he is officially enrolled in the Department of H.O.P.E.'s rehabilitation program — though officially placed there as part of a path to Hell for his crimes, his attendance is consistent, and he appears to genuinely enjoy the lessons (even if his classmates despise him).

Despite this hostility, Francis remains outwardly pleasant, even playful, often cracking jokes at his own expense. But every so often, the mask slips, revealing the cold, fanatical man who once plotted mass murder in the name of "saving" humanity. In these moments, the air around him changes; the joking professor becomes a prophet of doom, his charisma turning into something dangerous and magnetic.
