PERSONALITY

- Hot-Headed
- Bitter
- Extroverted
- Sporty
- Loudmouth
- Obnoxious

Eusebio Alvarado Rubio, better known by his nickname “El Once,” is a Puerto Rican professional boxer remembered for his speed, short stature, and volatile temper. Competing in the lightweight and flyweight divisions, he rises quickly in the regional boxing scene, though his promising career is cut short by steroid abuse and an untimely death at age 31.

Eusebio is a fighter both inside and outside the ring. While talented and disciplined during training, he is marked by jealousy, insecurity, and a short fuse. Standing at 1.60 m, his height often becomes a personal sore point, leading him to develop a “Napoleon complex,” perceiving slights or ridicule where there are none. This insecurity, mixed with his reliance on steroids, fuels his paranoia and tendency to lash out.

Despite these flaws, Eusebio has charisma. He is passionate, loud, and never afraid to voice his opinions. He frequently carries a portable JBL speaker blasting Spanish hip hop, much to the annoyance of other residents in Pripyatory.

ALVARADO

BACKGROUND

Eusebio is born and raised in San Juan, Puerto Rico, into a working-class family. Drawn to sports from a young age, he finds his outlet in boxing, where his natural speed and stamina allow him to dominate in lighter weight classes. In his 20s he also takes up weightlifting, motivated by a desire to appear bigger and stronger. His nickname "El Once" is drawn from the Colt 1911 pistol, referencing his reputation as small, quick, and unexpectedly powerful — "like a .45 round in a compact frame."

He trains at a local boxing gym, where he earns recognition as a champion in the flyweight category. However, his temper often causes rifts with trainers, promoters, and fellow fighters. His reliance on anabolic steroids, particularly trembolone, begins as a way to build confidence and sculpt a more imposing physique but quickly spirals into a dependency.

DEATH

Eusebio's career peaks when he qualifies for a regional championship fight that could put him on the international stage. However, a urine test returns positive for steroids, resulting in his immediate disqualification. During a heated argument with judges, referees, and even his opponent, his heart rate spikes above 190 bpm. The combination of emotional stress and steroid-induced strain causes sudden cardiac arrest. He collapses in front of the crowd and is pronounced dead shortly afterward, cutting his career and life short at 31 years old.

AFTERLIFE

In Pripyatory, Eusebio is a familiar figure at the BSA Anger Management sessions, often clashing with therapists and fellow residents. He spends much of his time at the gym, attempting to train and relive the discipline of his boxing days. His paranoia and short temper remain, making him a divisive presence among residents.

He is both mocked and pitied: mocked for his insecurities and his constant blasting of music on his portable speaker, but pitied for his visible frustration and emasculation from the side effects of steroid abuse. Although considered annoying by many, some residents admire his sheer persistence and the fact that, even in death, he continues to fight for recognition.
