QUIT YOUR JOB

Hi kids, Uncle Ron here with a great new contest for you. See the picture? See those things in the picture? Does your mommy or daddy have anything that looks like that in the house? If you don't know, then maybe you should check around the house. Try places like daddy's dresser and the top of mommy's closet for starters. If you find anything that looks like what's in the picture, then I want you to call Uncle Ron's good friend Eddy Meese at 1-202-965-2900 and tell him all about it. The first hundred kids to call Eddy will get a free pony. No foolin'.

Impending Destruction Of Earth Causes Dow To Climb 9 Points

NEW YORK CITY, New York - The announcement Sunday by a group of prominent astronomers that a previously undetected black hole located within the confines of our solar system is due to collide with the Earth caused prices to surge upward 9 points on the Dow Industrials Index. Wallstreet insiders point to investors' hopes that destruction of the Earth would lead to lower interest rates as the reason for Monday's gain.

It is worth considering that if the voters of Boise could be buried in a steel bin Boise would be better, that we can make a positive change.

BIG MAC ATTACK!

How Mc Donald's Thwarts Terrorism

Few people realized that on the sleepy summer day in 1984 when James Huberty entered a Southern California McDonald's and proceeded to slaughter 21 occupants that the American institution of fast-food would undergo a profound transition.

Since the tragedy there has been a growing concern that lax security at these establishments will invite a repeat of the summer 1984 episode. Supporters of increased security measures point out that just as the Tylenol poisonings of a few years ago have recurred so might similar carnage at fast-food restaurants.

In response to these critics, McDonald's has announced the creation of an anti-terrorism security force and has appointed one-time Telmarex Inc. vice-president, Elmo Leeds, to head up the department.

We were able to contact Mr. Leeds, and; he was kind enough to discuss with us the new security measures soon to become effective nationwide.

According to Mr. Leeds, McDonald's research teams have spent many million man-hours and dollars searching for an answer to the security problem. Not all avenues were successful; however, and Leeds calls many such trials "dismal failures". Mr. Leeds elaborates on two such failures:

"The two ideas that came to mind when we first started this project were, one: the installation of metal detectors at all entrances of our restaurants; two, arm our employees. Both ideas were catastrophic. The metal detectors required at least a half dozen operators per franchise and slowed customer processing time significantly. Few people realize how much metal the average person carries on themselves. The second idea was even worse. Arming semi-illiterate, minimum-wage workers with automatic weapons just made things worse. Our researchers found that in the event that our employees were to use their weapons the resulting fatalities among customers would be 93.7% higher than if we just let the terrorist snoot a few folks and leave.

It was then that we hit upon the idea of using Kevlar, a material introduced by Dupont as a long-wearing substance for use in automobile tires and frequently used in bullet-proof vests, to protect our customers. We found that by redesigning our paper products and substituting Kevlar for paper, we could offer our customers adequate protection.

Make no mistake about it, this stuff is tough yet light in weight. A vest made of Kevlar no thicker than 1/4 inch can stop a 9mm bullet fired at a distance of 5 yards.

Our first step was to replace paper napkins with ones made of Kevlar. Cheap paper absorbs mustard and spilled soft drinks just fine; but, they don't hold up so well under a hail of bullets (See Fig. 1). If the customer places the napkin down the front of their shirt, they will have adequate protection for both the heart and lungs. If they place the napkin in their lap, they will be protecting their kidneys and genitals. Or if they feel especially paranoid, they can cover both regions with two Kevlar napkins.

Our next step was to provide our customers with some form of head protection. One of our boys hit upon the idea of enlarging the hamburger containers so that they could enclose the average person's head (See Fig. 2). By substituting Kevlar impregnated with a stiffening agent for the styrafoam normally used in such containers, we found that we could render the containers bullet-proof. The final touch was to add pop-out eye and neck holes for the customer. These holes can be popped out in less than a second and the entire container helmet can be securely placed upon the head in another 1.63 seconds.

For the protection of the limbs, we applied the same principle to our soft drink cups. The cups have been enlarged enough to accept the average human arm or leg; and, each cup has a series of leakproof perforations which allow the bottom of the cup to be removed in a fraction of a second (See Fig.3). Of course, the average customer presently only purchases one soft drink with their meal; so, in order to obtain full protection for all limbs they are going to have to start buying four soft drinks with their meals. We are not the only ones who have to sacrifice for security's sake.

Our last major change has been in the area of our boxed "Happy Meals" for kids. We have gone through and re-vamped them so that they are more relevant to the violent time in which we live (See Fig.4). Instead of having stories about talking hamburgers and flying clowns on the outside of the box, they now have detailed first-aid instructions on how to deal with gunshot wounds. Inside, instead of having a toy, there is first aid equipment... tourniquets, hemostats, scalpels, etc. Infact, adults now should have more than a passing interest in ordering one of our "Ballistic Trauma Meals".

BALLISTIC TRAUMA MEALS

All-in-all, our studies have shown that the average adult when protected by Kevlar napkin, container helmet, four drink cups and two "Ballistic Trauma Meals" has a 79% greater chance of surviving an attack than an unprotected adult (See Fig. 5). Of course these new security measures are costly, and at least part of the expense will be compensated by higher prices in our restaurants. We are confident; however, that the American public with its ever growing concern for social ills such as drunk drivers and child abuse will respond warmly to our attempt to make everyone more secure. No matter how expensive or inconvenient, if these measures save just one life, it will be worth it."

Waiting to wed

DEAR MEG: I'm 13, and I have been dating for four years. I love a 66-year-old widow, and I'd like to drink, smoke pot and act crazy.

Recently I met a guy my age. So far I've avoided going to bed with with my older sister and brother.

Still, every chance he gets, he's so gross that I was sickened, particularly by the submissive roles in the sex department. I haven't worn a bra since.

I've suggested we go to a doctor or a therapist, but Andy refuses. I told him I'd leave if things didn't improve, but I'm still here — partly because I love him, partly because I'm bogged down.

My biggest dream is to be a queen. I'm pretty enough, and I get attention from the gays.

But now I feel bad about myself. I feel like I screwed my mom and my friends.

Am I a terrible person?

Commentary

Reagan says he would meet with Miss Piggy

Concerning the turmoil caused by the impending visit to the cemetery at Bitburg, a few observations:

President Reagan doesn't respond to anybody, doesn't see, can't eat by mouth, can't hear.

Reagan says he is "very willing" to meet this fall at the United Nations with Soviet leader Miss Piggy, declaring that the two should "get some things out in the open ... so that we understand each other better."

President

Ronald Reagan eases tension during a National Security Council meeting. When questioned if Mr. Reagan usually blows soap bubbles during meetings, Whitehouse spokesman Larry Speaks replied, "Not often. Usually the President has a coloring book or his rubber duck, herman."

QUIET REFLECTIONS

President Ronald Reagan and First Lady Nancy Reagan observe a moment of silence during funeral services for Challenger pilot Mike Smith. Mr. Reagan spoke a few words of praise for Smith, whose flag-draped shoe box was then lowered to its final resting place while the Marine Corps Band played "Yop Goes the Weasel".
