

Argentina's "stone sentinel," Aconcagua—tallest mountain in the Western Hemisphere—shows its south face under a plume of snow blowing east at more than 100 miles an hour.

From isolated outpost to modern showplace, Nairobi has ridden Kenya's tide of progress. This mile-high capital of 350,000, one of Africa's biggest cities, began only seventy years ago as a makeshift camp on the pioneering Kenya-Uganda Railroad. Dubbed the "safari capital of the world." It sends streams of hunters, photographers, and sightseers into Kenya's game-rich hinterlands. Haze-veiled Machakos Hills rim the southeast horizon. Nairobi National Park, a 44-square-mile game sanctuary, lies only a lion's roar south of the city.

© NATIONAL GEOGRAPHIC SOCIETY