Lash of white water stings a jet-boat pilot taking tourists down the seething Salmon River. Careening between mile-high canyon walls by day, camping at night in the haunt of bear and bighorn sheep, some 4,000 sightseers a year brave the "River of No Return" and its turbulent feeder streams. Conservationists press to have the Salmon join its Middle Fork tributary as a federally protected wild and scenic river, to preserve its beauty and isolation.

Sliced by erosion's scalpel, the Bruneau Canyon bisects a desert plateau in the state's mostly roadless southwest. The gorge drops nearly 1,000 feet between walls so close in places that a visitor on one rim can fling a rock across to the other.
